

Dear friends,

When I left my previous Circuit, I was kindly given an old SLR 35mm film camera from the 1970s. These days we usually take photos on digital cameras and mobile phones. Digital photography has huge advantages. We can take multiple shots and see the photos instantly on a screen. The pictures contain more details and the colours, contrast, shadows and highlights can be easily adjusted with software. Indeed, the AI in my mobile phone camera will make a grey sky blue.

I recently used the SLR camera for the first time with a roll of 36-exposure black and white film. When I'd finished it, I had to wait a further couple of weeks from posting the film off to the photolab before receiving the developed photos. (There was one difference from the old days however in that I downloaded the photos as scanned jpgs, rather than getting them as prints.) Below are two of those pictures – Walton Methodist Church and boats on the River Thames.

Film photography isn't cheap. I had to take my time to compose and focus the pictures in the viewfinder as I only really had one opportunity at each shot. The camera's inbuilt light meter wasn't reliable after all these years, but fortunately I remembered the old 'sunny 16' rule to work out the shutter speed and aperture f-number. With a digital camera, I could have produced clearer images at no cost with automatic focussing and exposure - but that's not the point. I was forced to slow down and enjoy the process in taking these photos. It's no wonder that many younger photographers who grew up with digital are discovering and enjoying film for the first time.

Lent is a good time for slowing down and taking the time to reflect up on our life and faith. During this season, many of our churches have special Lent courses and times for reflection. The Methodist Church's Lent theme this year is Soul Food and there is material online which can be found with a simple internet search.

One of the reasons I enjoy photography is that it gives me the chance to look around me in wonder at God's world, to pray for the brokenness and rejoice at the beauty in it. You don't need a film camera or any type of camera to do that. Lent gives us the opportunity for it.
